In a motivational sense, moderately difficult tasks that are moderately challenging to a student are motivating. There are many principles of motivation that derive from expectancy-value theory. Expectancy = the perceived probability of success. Value = the value of the goal.

motivation: issues and explanation
Motivation is the drive or reason to do something at a goal will contribute to the amount of effort they put forth. There are several types of expectancy that may contribute to this, two of which are primary needs and secondary needs.

One theory contrasts implicit and explicit motivation. When we are implicitly motivated, our behavior is driven by the idea that we will achieve a goal that is important to us. Another theory emphasizes the students’ expectancy for success. Students need to believe that their learning is relevant and meaningful.
