Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–1797) was one of the most influential and controversial women of her age. No writer, except perhaps her political foe, Edmund Burke, and her fellow reformer, Thomas Paine, was largely concerned with “equality among men.” However, despite his stress on “the importance of equal civil and political rights for men and women in private and public life,” Burke was not a revolutionary in the sense of Wollstonecraft. Mary Wollstonecraft, the feminist author of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), was a progressive thinker advocating radical reform. Nevertheless, after witnessing the turbulent results of the French Revolution, Wollstonecraft left for Paris and took an American lover.

Debates about gender equality were part of a broader discussion about human equality and social justice. Mary Wollstonecraft and her contemporaries were influenced by the philosophies of Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Edmund Burke. Rousseau’s idea of the perfect noble savage contrasted with Burke’s view of human degeneration under the influence of civilization.

Wollstonecraft’s writing in several new genres, including philosophical tracts, dialogues, and imaginative literature, contributed to the development of English literature. She was a precursor of the Romantic movement, and her ideas about the natural equality of men and women were influential in the development of feminist thought.

Her essay "The Politics of Sense and Sensibility: Mary Wollstonecraft and Catharine Macaulay on Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France" won both the Marian D. Irish Award and the science fiction studies award.
